LAUGH a LOT

Handling the Undesired Unexpected Visitor?

There are some people who make it a habit of dropping in unexpectedly at the wrong time. Just before supper or lunch. Or when you want to settle down to a nice quiet evening. THEY arrive! The excuse is always the same.

"We were in the neighborhood and thought how nice it would be to say Hello to you."

So normally you surrender. You are polite no matter how it kills you inside. But some people have worked out a technique on how to handle these undesired unexpected visitors. Mr. Furman has a good idea:

"I bought a phone in my TV store. You can see the wire from it to the wall. It goes no place. When I get that person I don't want dropping in on me, I go into action. I press a hidden button. The phone rings. Then I speak into it. 'An emergency. You must see me at once. Will be over within ten minutes.'" Then turning to the human beings in front of me I regret I have to leave. It works fine!"

Mrs. Winston has another technique. She keeps a coat on a chair. Then when that unexpected visitor comes in, she merely smiles:

"Must be on my way. Marsha is ill. Know you'll excuse me. Perhaps another time. Call first and see if I can remain at home for you."

That one always works. I like the one Bob and his wife use when those people drop in at supper time.

"So glad you came. We have reservations for supper at the Martina Club. Fifteen dollars a person. If you want to join us and spend the money, you will have a nice time. Unfortunately we have reserved a table for two. So that means you will have to sit at another table." That one scares them off.

Grandma's Problem

They met during a summer vacation and it was love at first sight. He was a young psychiatrist. And she happened to be the daughter of the president of Matson Company. A nice rich but still unspoiled girl. And so they set the date for the wedding.

"I hate to ask you to do this for me," she sighed. "But we have a problem with grandma. She is always complaining. Wonder if you would see her? And get to the root of the situation."

He agreed and grandma showed up to the minute for her appointment in his office. She sat in a chair and before he could ask her anything she began her long list of complaints:

"Things aren't the way they were in my day when I was a young girl. These children do not respect nor obey their parents. They are always on the protest line. Joining every movement that comes up. And the way they dress! Most disgraceful kind of short clothing that the girls wear. And the young men. They ought to be ashamed of themselves. Refuse to get haircuts. Putting the poor barbers out of business. And they won't even shave. Some of them I have met won't even wash.

Oh, what is the world coming to? We are getting ready for World War III. And when it begins, it will be all over within five minutes. No more world. No more people. Maybe that is the best way to solve the problem of pollution. No more fresh air. We can be wiped out slowly or quickly. And then there is crime in the street. Not safe to walk by yourself anymore."

"Why are you complaining about everyone else? Do you know why?" he asked.

"Of course I know why," she smiled. "Takes my mind off myself."

Too Late

Marsha and Ben had been sort of going out with each other for five months. She called him her boy friend. Then he received a promotion and figured that he could eventually support a wife. As soon as Marsha's family learned of his serious intention, their attitude changed. He was invited twice a week to dine with the family. Brother Frank liked Ben because Ben had played football at college for one year. But there was one exception and in a way quite understandable.

Little sister Helen felt hurt. She was no longer so close to her older sister. Seemed a stranger had come in - between them. Mother did her best to explain the situation. All that little sister Helen knew, was that she was being left out of things. Formerly Marsha took her out. Now to her way of thinking, Marsha was taking Ben out. And then came the matter of the picnic.

The country had opened a new picnic ground near Lake Maritoba. And Marsha and Ben were going there on Sunday. That was all she heard. The picnic! What Marsha was going to wear. What they would take in the lunch basket. They would swim in the new pool. They would rent a rowboat and fish in the lake. Always THEY! Being a little girl she cried and cried to herself. And then came the Sunday morning. Ben called for Marsha in his new little car. Which was then loaded with the things needed for the picnic. They left the house, went up to the corner, and then turned around. Came back to the house. Marsha and Ben faced little Helen.

"Come on with us," she smiled. "The weather is beautiful. You will have a wonderful time."

"Too late, too late," sobbed little Helen. "I prayed for rain. You should have asked me yesterday."
